What you need to know about the Public Order Act, the law used to arrest coronation protesters

Six coronation protesters were arrested - and subsequently released - under the new Public Order Act. Here's what you need to know about the controversial new law

London's Met Police has defended using the new Public Order Act to arrest protesters during King Charles' coronation, after anti-monarchy activists were locked up ahead of the ceremony.

The government said new laws were needed to deal with the disruptive protests of Just Stop Oil, but the legislation was met with widespread warnings from experts and civil liberties groups that it infringes on the civil liberties of everyone in the UK.

Protesters who tunnel, lock on, or obstruct infrastructure and transport projects have all been criminalised by the new law. But the arrests at the coronation also showed how the law could be used to stamp out protest even when demonstrators do their best to stay within the new rules.

If you're wondering what's going on, here's everything you need to know about the Public Order Act.

What is the Public Order Act?

The Public Order Act became law in the days before the coronation and includes new criminal offences designed by the government to deal with protests it sees as

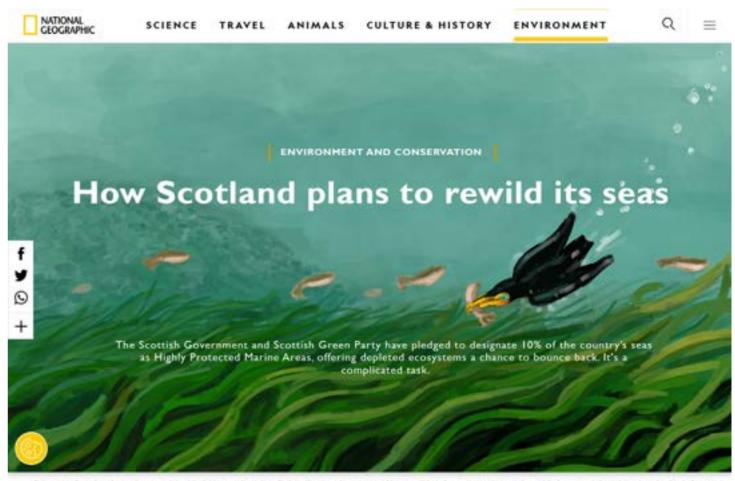

There are new offences for locking on and going equipped to lock on, a tactic often used by protesters to disrupt traffic and draw attention by fixing themselves to public areas. Locking on can be penalised with six months in prison and/or an unlimited fine, while going equipped to lock on can be punished with an unlimited

Seagrass farming is seen as a critical habitat and tool to fight climate change, and is capable of sequestering carbon 35 times quicker than tropical rainforests without the associated burning hazards. The habitat is vulnerable to fishing methods such as seafloor dredging.

Our boat is rocking just a few miles offshore, as we watch nature unleash a wildly dynamic display. Churning the ocean into a bubbling cauldron creatures from sea and sky dart and dive to the waves. At least seven minke whales rise and fall as seals swirl, shearwaters swoop and gannets launch missile attacks with pointed precision from above. This astonishing scene could be taking place in South Africa or New Zealand, but my boat is bobbing in the frigid North Atlantic waters of the Inner Hebrides, an archipelago off the coast of Argyll in western Scotland.

"Our marine and birdlife here is pretty spectacular," says Shane Wasik, founder of Basking Shark Scotland, which leads low-impact wildlife and water sport tours around Argyll's coastline and islands. A hotspot for the second-largest fish in the ocean, the Inner Hebrides sees large numbers of basking sharks visiting the region each summer, feeding with their huge mouths agape in the zooplankton-rich seas.
